Why does land management so often fail to prevent soil erosion, deforestation, salination and flooding? How serious are these problems, and for whom? This book, first published in 1987, sets out to answer these questions, which are still some of the most crucial issues in development today, using an approach called 'regional political ecology'. This approach

Perhaps the most common such hypothesis is that which attributes degradation to pressure of population on resources (which we shall henceforth call PPR), and therefore to growth in the numbers and density of population on the face of the earth. It does indeed seem self-evident that growth in numbers will cause land to be used more heavily; and that as the per capita area of arable and grazing land grows smaller, the sheer necessity of production will force farmers to use land in disregard of ...

Land degradation—the deterioration or loss of the productive capacity of the soils for present and future—is a global challenge that affects everyone through food insecurity, higher food prices, climate change, environmental hazards, and the loss of biodiversity and ecosystem services. Land degradation is happening at an alarming pace, contributing to a dramatic decline in the productivity of croplands and rangelands worldwide.
